Abstract

This R Markdown template is for writing an Oxford University thesis. The template is built using Yihui Xie's `bookdown` package, with heavy inspiration from Chester Ismay's `thesisdown` and the `OxThesis` LaTeX template (most recently adapted by John McManigle).

This template's sample content include illustrations of how to write a thesis in R Markdown, and largely follows the structure from this R Markdown workshop.

Congratulations for taking a step further into the lands of open, reproducible science by writing your thesis using a tool that allows you to transparently include tables and dynamically generated plots directly from the underlying data. Hip hooray!

Consider a variable, y_{it}, that can be decomposed as follows:

$$y_{it} = g_{it} + a_{it} \tag{3.1}$$

where g_{it} is a systematic component and a_{it} is a transitory component. To further separate common from idiosyncratic components, we could apply where δ_{it} is an idiosyncratic component and μ_t is a common component.
